Voice search: it's one of the biggest battles going on in tech today and Google just let off its latest round of ammo.

The internet giant today announced that voice search for Android would now support an additional 13 languages. The feature was already available in 29 languages, bringing the total to 42 languages and accents supported in 46 countries.

According to Google, this means that 100-million people across world can now find what they want by speaking to their phones.
