

How 'community projects' can help with unemployment in 2018

 By Professor Elain Mok

11 Jan 2018

South Africa's employment rate is currently sitting at 27%, which is at its highest level since September 2003. A quarter of South Africa's citizens remain jobless and we are at a critical time in our economy where food prices continue to rise and jobs are scarce. Can community projects possibly help both of these needs for 2018?

I think they can, albeit on a small scale. Based purely on the success of the 'mamas' under the Clover Mama Afrika wing, we have witnessed the positive impact of community projects. I started Clover Mama Afrika in 2004 with a passion to implement change and set up a corporate social investment initiative of which both Clover and I could be proud. During the last thirteen years, I've watched as our efforts to help communities have developed into successful small businesses, creating jobs and sustaining communities at the same time.

Supporting communities, providing employment opportunities

To date, we've appointed 43 women as part of the project - we call them 'mamas' due to the nurturing role they fill in their communities. These mamas serve as examples of how community projects can both support a community and provide employment opportunities.

Take Mama Selestien Moses for example. She became a Clover Mama in April 2007. Mama Sella runs the Khayaletu Care Centre in Ashbury in the Western Cape. As part of our commitment to her, Clover Mama Afrika provided her with the skills, equipment and training that she needed to further develop her community project. She's since grown her centre's capacity, caring for more than 300 children and over 80 elderly. She now supports her community with a variety of additional skills, from bread baking, catering and flower arranging to sewing. Mama Sella currently employs 17 people and has transferred skills to over 400 others in her community.

Another prime example is Mama Shirley Merime of Ennerdale, Gauteng. Mama Shirley joined Clover Mama Afrika in 2006 to upskill herself and others at her Ebenezer Hannah Home - a home that looks after both the elderly and orphaned and abandoned children. Through the training received from our team she's helped to further upskill another 137 people and now employs 11 permanent staff at the home.

While employment can be difficult to find, these mamas provide opportunities at grassroots level. This means employees don't need to have degrees or to travel far in search of work. Community projects give people with little skill the chance to grow and thrive.

Expanding positive impact

Virginie Merime, daughter-in-law of Mama Shirley, is one of the many people positively impacted by Clover Mama Afrika's involvement. Virginie helped her mom-in-law with the day-to-day needs at the centre, where she was able to take part in courses and skills workshops we helped to provide. We saw her keen interest in cooking and through our friends at MLK Chef School and the financial assistance of Clover Mama Afrika, Virginie won a fantastic Chef's course to help her follow her dreams.

These women show us that community projects or small businesses that are run with passion, by owners who are committed to the development of their communities can certainly make a difference. The 28 employees between Mama Sella and Mama Shirley alone are testament to this. Small businesses can help communities at grassroots level, providing necessities in the area while offering work opportunities for its people.

I urge you to support small community businesses not only in 2018 but continuously - you've no idea how much of an impact you can make and how many lives you're touching.

ABOUT PROFESSOR ELAIN VLOK

Professor Elain Vlok is the founder of Clover Mama Afrika. A BSc in Home Economics marked the start of her academic pursuits, and she has gone on to complete the following degrees to name but a few: BA Library Science (Honours), BA Hons in Zulu, BA Hons in Communication, an MA in Zulu, a doctorate in Communication and an MA in Sociology (Counselling). All these degrees were obtained with distinction.

■ #BizTrends2019: Deriving greater business impact from CSI initiatives - 7 Jan 2019

■ #BizTrends2018: How 'community projects' can help with unemployment in 2018 - 11 Jan 2018

View my profile and articles...

For more, visit: <https://www.bizcommunity.com>